2. What kind of home do you live in? How is it similar to or different from your neighbours' homes?

Homes Around the World

- 1 Step outside your own front door and you will find a huge variety of homes across the globe, each shaped by climate, geography and culture. In Mongolia, many nomadic families still live in a ger, a round, portable tent made of felt and wood that can be packed up and moved within a few hours when herders travel to new grazing land. In Hong Kong, by contrast, more than seven million people live in one of the most densely populated cities on Earth, and most families share small, efficient apartments stacked dozens of storeys high above narrow streets.
- 2 In parts of Southeast Asia and West Africa, stilt houses raise the living space above rivers, floodwater or simply the damp ground, keeping homes cooler and safer from pests. In the Netherlands, some families have chosen to live on the water itself, in houseboats moored along the canals — a practical answer to a small, flat country with limited land. Meanwhile, in the suburbs of many Western cities, detached houses with private gardens remain the dream for families who value space and privacy above all else.
- 3 These differences are rarely accidental. A home's shape, size and materials usually reflect what is available locally, how extended a family typically is, and how much space a culture expects each generation to share. Understanding housing diversity, then, is really a way of understanding how people everywhere adapt to their environment — and to each other.

1. What do you think are the biggest challenges of living with grandparents or other relatives in the same house?
2. Predict: what solutions might a family find for daily conflicts like these?

Three Generations, One Roof

- 1 When Zeynep's grandparents moved in with her family two years ago, the house suddenly felt smaller — and louder. Zeynep, her parents, her younger brother, and now her grandparents all share one kitchen, one living room, and, most of the time, one opinion about how loudly the television should be played. 'At first, it was strange,' Zeynep admits. 'My grandmother wanted dinner at six, my parents preferred eight, and nobody could agree on the thermostat.'

- 2 Daily conflicts like these are common in multi-generational households, where different generations often have different habits, schedules and expectations about privacy. Zeynep's family found that the biggest arguments weren't really about dinner times or the television — they were about respect and personal space. Her parents felt that they had lost some control over their own home; her grandparents felt that their advice, built on decades of experience, was not always welcome.
- 3 Slowly, the family developed a few simple house rules: everyone gets one hour of quiet time in the evening, chores are divided fairly between the generations, and big decisions — from meals to holidays — are discussed together at a short Sunday meeting. 'It's not perfect,' says Zeynep, 'but we've learned to compromise, and honestly, having my grandparents here has been the best thing that's happened to our family. My brother and I have learned so much from them, and they don't feel lonely anymore.'
